The National Party is patching up its websites after being a target of hacking activists.

Around a dozen party sites, including those of ministers and the Prime Minister, were targeted in a protest against the Government's GCSB legislation.

A group identifying itself as Anonymous NZ have claimed responsibility for the attacks.

National Party President Peter Goodfellow says some of their sites are still down, and efforts are being made to restore them and protect them against future attack.

He says he is still finding out exactly what has happened, and has made no decisions about whether formal complaints will be made with authorities.

Simon Bridges has had his website hacked but is treating it as a bit of a joke.

"This is a great travesty. I'm very concerned about it.

"The hundreds of thousands of people who will have been looking at it daily, now don't know what to do."

Justice Minister Judith Collins was also a target, but is taking it more seriously.

"It just shows you that these people have tremendous powers, that they are completely unregulated, and that they wreak havoc."
