

HOME | CONTACT | WRITE TO THE EDITOR | WORK AT FREE-TIMES

Cedar Terrace
Convenient to USC Medical School & 5 Points

BLOGS | BEST OF COLUMBIA | NEWS+OPINIONS | MUSIC | ARTS+CULTURE | DINING | REAL ESTATE | JOBS | ARCHIVES | CLASSIFIEDS

GET BOLD & SPICY COLUMBIA!

Find Charleston Mix at your local grocery store.
The Bloody Mary Perfected. Enjoy Every Sip.

Issue #26.06 :: 02/06/2013 - 02/12/2013

Bill Would End Public Notices in Newspapers

BY EVA MOORE

For the third year in a row, an Upstate lawmaker is pushing a bill that would let counties publish public notices on their websites rather than in newspapers.

Republican Rep. Wendy Nanney says her bill is about saving taxpayers money and improving access to information.

Under state law, counties are required to buy print ads announcing foreclosures, delinquent taxes, zoning hearings, county council and other public meetings, elections, tax increases and many other items of public interest. Nanney's bill would let counties advertise everything except elections on their websites instead of in a newspaper.

"Newspapers are declining," Nanney says, citing dropping circulation numbers for print newspapers. "I read my news online now. We no longer get the paper at the house."

But the head of the state's press association says people won't look on county websites to find important information — they'll look in a newspaper.

"You want to know if there's a strip club opening next to you — are you going to go on the website and see that? No, you'll see it in the newspaper," says Bill Rogers, executive director of the South Carolina Press Association, which is lobbying against the bill.

The association did a test two years ago, Rogers says, putting 200 unserved warrant announcements on the Darlington County Sheriff's Department website and 200 in the local newspaper.

"The paper outperformed the website 7 to 1," Rogers says. "That's pretty strong evidence that people read it in the newspaper who won't see it online."

But Nanney says the study might not have been fair, because people didn't know they should look online for that information.

"It will be a training process to get people to know where to go and look at it," she says.

Nanney says Greenville County could save close to $1 million if the bill passes.

But when Free Times asked Richland County to estimate how much it spends on public notice advertising, staffers came up with a number just under $20,000. That includes the budgeted amounts from the planning and zoning departments, procurement, Richland County Council and more.

"In the overall scheme of our budget, it certainly would be a cost savings, but not tremendous," says Stephany Snowden, the county's public information director.

She cautions that the estimate isn't exact, though.

City of Columbia staffers estimate they spend $60,000 a year on public notices.

Your Say

Comments (1)

EMAIL THIS STORY

PRINT THIS STORY

WRITE A LETTER TO THE AUTHOR

SHARE

MORE LOCAL & STATE NEWS - COLUMBIA, SC FROM THIS ISSUE:

- What County Does School Board Member Kim Murphy Live In?
- Will Lindsey Graham Draw Primary Challenger?

MORE BY Eva Moore:

- Valentine's Day Edition — Or Not
- Consumer Advocates Warn of Tax Preparation Costs
- An Evening of Chocolate

Full Site Search

ft Free Times FreeTimesSC

FreeTimesSC THE PLAYLIST | Art Boerke, local music scene legend, has died: ow.ly/hQuWa
40 minutes ago · reply · retweet · favorite

FreeTimesSC THE PLAYLIST | Incoming: Band of Horses to Play the Township in May ow.ly/hOB7V
23 hours ago · reply · retweet · favorite

FreeTimesSC Bill would bar some PAC giving; Gamecocks championship ring for sale ow.ly/hOAwS
23 hours ago · reply · retweet · favorite

Join the conversation

Recent freetimes CONVERSATIONS

- they forgot to mention the awesome vegan desserts ... - Mary
- KO, thank you for mentioning the big guy. I went t... - Robbie
- I have a poetry chapbook in the works, but am comp... - Gus Becker
- Not all members and elected officials in each part... - Sylvie Kenig Dessau
- I can't say how many times I've commented to the S... - forgetitbaby

While the bill under consideration would only apply to counties, Nanney says the Municipal Association of South Carolina has approached her about including municipalities, too.

The S.C. Association of Counties supports the bill, according to the Charleston Post and Courier, saying it would give counties more flexibility.

However, for Rogers, public notice in newspapers is also a matter of security and transparency.

“When you put it in a newspaper, it’s printed and it’s there, and it can’t be changed or hacked,” he says. “Online, who knows? ‘Oh well, we forgot to put that notice up, we’ll just put it up now.’ Or ‘Oh, we’ll take it down.’ All kinds of things can happen. Look what happened to the Department of Revenue,” he says, recalling the theft in 2012 of millions of South Carolinians’ personal and financial information from state computers.

The association has also suggested the end of public notice could shut down smaller newspapers across the state.

As the digital age advances, some states have revised their public notice laws, creating central online repositories for public notices or requiring newspapers that print public notices to run them online, too.

In Texas this week, the legislature is considering a bill similar to the one Nanney is proposing. The Dallas Morning News reports the bill is being fought by open government advocates in that state.

Nanney says she wasn’t following the lead of another state when she wrote her bill.

The South Carolina Press Association claimed a small victory last week when Nanney’s bill was sent to the Judiciary committee rather than getting a vote by the full House. Nanney says she should know this week when the committee plans to take up the bill for discussion.

Our Take

More people are getting their information online, and we support efforts to put more public notices online, too — but not at the expense of publishing them in print. Frankly, we sleep a lot better at night knowing local governments have to answer to an independent third party when it comes to notifying the public.

Let us know what you think: Email editor@free-times.com.

Comment using...

Richard Able · Top Commenter

How about the around 30% who don't have a computer. Some politicians are just idiots.

Reply · 1 · Like · February 11 at 6:23am

John L. Knight Jr · Quality Manager at Nicosia Consulting International, LLC

How many people actually read the public notices? I don't think many. I quit getting the State newspaper because it was so bad.

Reply · Like · February 11 at 7:41am

Bryant King · Columbia, South Carolina

The Worst Part of Being Homeless: 'No One Sees Me'.
www.alternet.org
People may say they want to help the homeless, but their behavior reveals something else.

Reply · Like · February 7 at 9:14am

Facebook social plugin

Comments

The Worst Part of Being Homeless: 'No One Sees Me'
www.alternet.org People may say they want to help the homeless, but their behavior reveals something else.

Bryant February 7th 12:14pm

Have your say

* Name:

* E-mail (will not be published):

* Message:

Spam prevention. Enter the code from the image below

jazm

*

* Required

Your comment will be displayed after it has been reviewed by our editors. Please refer to our comments policy if you have any questions, or email editor@free-times.com.

Copyright © 2013, Portico Publications
Copyright Info | Portico Corporate

Powered by PLANet w3 CMS Content Management System
PLANet Systems Group 2013